Fire Is Greatest Killer in Raids

Is Conclusion Reached by Board of Medical Men.

WASHINGTON.—Fire, not the exploding bomb, is the greatest raid killer and the chief menace against which civilians must be protected if the country is to survive future wars.

That is the grim conclusion reached by a special board of medical men and scientists after a survey of U. S. strategic bombing of Germany during the war has just been made public.

They found that bombings in the Reich killed 500,000 civilians, wounded 700,000 and made 7,000,000 homeless. Deaths from actual bomb blasts, however, were relatively infrequent as only persons within 30 yards of an explosion were affected. Fire was the real killer.

"Preliminary reports from Hiroshima and Nagasaki," the report said, "indicate that the number and type of injuries sustained in an atomic bomb attack do not differ greatly from those inflicted upon the German civilian population in the great fire raids."

The Germans called the raids on industrial cities "fire blitzards."

The fires created 90-mile-an-hour winds which literally sucked many persons into the flames. Street temperatures were recorded up to 1,472 degrees Fahrenheit.

Up to 80 per cent of air raid deaths in Germany were due to carbon monoxide poisoning which attacked victims in cellar shelters or trapped in wreckage. The gas came from imperfect combustion and broken gas mains.

Breathing superheated air and hot burns caused many deaths. Many bodies were found shriveled from extreme dehydration, with no sign of other injury.

It was found that safest protection was provided by so-called formal shelters, buildings five to seven stories high with walls and floors nine feet thick, and self-contained ventilation, heating, water and supplies.

Some Really Big Bombers Coming, Gen. Arnold Says

NEW YORK.—General of the Army Henry H. Arnold predicted development of super bombers capable of flying nonstop for 10,000 miles—more than four times the distance between New York and London.

The general added: "There is not only the super bomber which can carry atomic bombs and cruise about the globe, there are also the robot planes which will be able to perform the same spectacular flights, with a non-existing crew. And the damage that will be wreaked by a radar directed V-2 weapon equipped with an atomic bomb is indeed a far too terrible thing to contemplate."

Against the possible use of such weapons by other nations, General Arnold said, the United States must have a "sure and certain defense."

"Our hope lies, then," he added, "in a policy of offensive readiness to perpetuate peace—provide for national security."

Allies Received More Vehicles Than We Did

BOSTON, MASS.—Allied nations received more American tanks and trucks than the United States overseas forces, according to Col. H. B. Sheets, commander of the Boston Ordnance District.

Sheets said that statistics showed that Russian, English and Chinese troops received 785,339 vehicles of all shapes and sizes, compared with 654,085 shipped to American supply depots abroad. He said Russia received 499,461, the United Kingdom 228,110 and China 28,348.

Nearly 2,000 more tanks were shipped to Britain than our own forces in the Pacific, Mediterranean and European theaters received, Sheets said.
